Scott Bessent has become considerably more than President Trump's Treasury secretary. Bessent therefore has several objectives that occasionally pull against one another: Keep inflation under control. Get borrowing costs down. Protect the Treasury market. Avoid a disorderly currency crisis in Japan. Keep pressure on Iran. Manage the aftermath of the Supreme Court tariff decision. Implement Trump's tax and savings agenda. And persuade markets that the United States can continue financing its debt without permanently elevated interest rates. That is an unusually broad portfolio for a Treasury secretary.

BIG WIN today at the U.S. Court of International Trade on one of the most DESPICABLE loopholes in American Trade Policy — The so-called “de minimis” exemption.

For years, Foreign Shippers could send packages worth up to $800 into our Country, DUTY FREE, NO TARIFF, far less scrutiny. It became a giant loophole for TARIFF Cheats — and a Pipeline exploited by Fentanyl Traffickers, Counterfeiters, and other Criminals shipping dangerous and illegal products into America. The numbers were staggering. In 2024 alone, de minimis cost America an estimated 10.8 BILLION DOLLARS in foregone TARIFF Revenue, and an astonishing share of narcotics and counterfeit seizures came through the de minimis channel. So, we CLOSED IT. With the stroke of my mighty pen — NO AUTOPEN!!! — we ended this ridiculous giveaway, and made Foreign Goods play by the rules. The Importers sued. Today, THEY LOST. The Court ruled that the President had the Legal Authority to rescind this so-called “privilege.”

America is now SAFER, our Workers are better protected, and BILLIONS in TARIFF Revenue that used to slip through this loophole can instead help pay for our Great Military, Tax Relief, NO TAX ON TIPS, and NO TAX ON SOCIAL SECURITY. AMERICA FIRST TRADE — AND AMERICA FIRST LAW ENFORCEMENT!

Julian Assange sounded the alarm about history being erased without a trace. Climate.gov shows exactly what he meant. Assange warned about news articles being quietly removed from websites and search indexes during a WikiLeaks discussion in 2012. Visitors encountered "page not found," while no public record explained what had disappeared. He called it an "undetected erasure of history." That warning has gained new relevance as scientific information disappears from U.S. government websites.

The Trump administration terminated nearly all employees responsible for Climate.gov in 2025. The NOAA website, which had published climate data, maps, educational materials and reporting for 15 years, stopped producing new content and was later redirected to a general NOAA climate page. Federal webpages hosting previous National Climate Assessments also went offline. The congressionally mandated reports explain how climate change affects every U.S. region and help communities prepare infrastructure, water systems and emergency plans.

The administration also dismissed nearly 400 experts working on the next assessment, placing its future in doubt. The removals extend beyond climate science. More than 8,000 federal webpages disappeared shortly after Trump returned to office, while thousands of datasets were removed from government platforms. Some were later restored, although researchers found that certain resources had been altered or returned without complete documentation. Digital information is not inherently fragile. It can be copied and distributed almost instantly. The vulnerability comes when the authoritative version, its updates and the links leading to it remain under the control of one institution.

Independent archivists are now rebuilding what disappeared. Former Climate.gov staff and volunteers restored its collection at Climate.us, while Harvard preserved more than 300,000 federal datasets. The Internet Archive and data-rescue groups have saved thousands more. These archives can preserve existing records, but they cannot replace continued government research, updates or data collection.

Do you agree with Pete?

Red Wave News Pete Hegseth is speaking a hard truth too many prefer to ignore. The Crusades stood as a necessary defense of Christian Europe against waves of conquest that sought to erase its identity and faith. That resolve preserved a civilization whose values still shape the West. America now confronts its own threats from ideologies and movements that reject our founding principles, erode our borders, and mock the culture that built this nation. Endless apology and hesitation only invite further pressure. Strength and clarity are the only language that works. An American Crusade means putting our people first, defending our heritage without shame, and restoring the confidence of a free nation. Pete is right. It is time we act like it.

Neurolab waiting for you · alixe., Antent ·

This one deserves to be shared for the right reasons. Destany "Sky" Pete, a Duck Valley high school student, watched cancer and diabetes rise among her Shoshone and Paiute people, and saw a link others were missing: as her community lost its traditional foods, its modern health crises grew. So she brought her ancestral knowledge into the laboratories of Boise State University to study the chokecherry, a berry long central to her people's diet. The detail that mattered was the method, she prepared the traditional chokecherry pudding, "toishabui," exactly as her ancestors did, carefully crushing the berry seeds, where modern shortcut versions fell short. In the lab, her authentic preparation slowed and halted the growth of aggressive uterine cancer cells within 24 hours, surprising the researchers and earning her First Grand Prize over hundreds of competitors.

Here's the honest context, because it matters: this is an early lab finding, cancer cells in a dish, not a treatment tested in people. It's the exciting first step that opens the door to further research, not a cure. But that is exactly how science begins, with a great question and a surprising result. And that's what makes her achievement so remarkable: a teenager honored her heritage, pointed science toward something worth studying, and earned her place in a university lab. Follow us for the science, and the people, quietly changing what we know. Source: Manning, S. S. (2017, June 12). Bringing science and culture together with chokecherry pudding.
